Proposed Site of Oregon's New State Capitol Building

This is one of the suggested sites for Oregon's new state capitol. The Legislature will be called into special session soon to authorize construction of a new building to replace the statehouse destroyed by fire last April 25. This site is a combination of the present capitol grounds, the Willamette University campus and a part of Willson Park.

Here is a striking view of the old Oregon capitol as the flames attacked its classic dome. It is proposed that the old capitol grounds be made a sunken garden and the new building erected on the adjoining Willamette University campus and Willson Park.

Bush's Pasture, famous acreage tract within the city limits of Salem, a portion of which will become home of Willamette University, in the event the Oregon Legislature accepts the present Willamette campus as part of the site of the new capitol building. Willamette's offer to surrender its present site is approved by university trustees and the city of Salem.

"GREATER LOVE HATH NO MAN THAN THIS"

By C. B. Robertson

One of the most beautiful friendships in all history was between General U. S. Grant and General Simon Bolivar Buckner. They had been classmates at West Point Military Academy, yet when the Civil War began, came to the parting of the way. General Grant espoused the cause of the Union, while the Southerner, General Buckner, espoused the cause of the Confederacy. They had not met for several years until the surrender of Fort Donelson, February 15, 1862. Buckner was second in command. General Pillow, seeing surrender was the only way out, slipped out during the night. General Buckner when asked if he would assume command, like a true soldier replied, "I will accept it and share the fate of my command." Grant demanded an unconditional surrender to which Buckner agreed. After terms had been agreed upon Grant took Buckner aside for private conversation, and clasping his hand warmly he said, "Buckner you and your boys have been having a hard time here and may need something for your personal use. Here is my pocketbook. It is at your disposal, and I shall feel grateful and complimented if you will accept this offer in the same spirit in which it is offered." The offer was accepted and 23 years later repaid.

for your personal use. I want you to accept a loan from me as a favor." Although General Grant at first declined, Buckner was persistent and rejoiced when Grant, almost overcome with emotion by this touching evidence of friendship, accepted a loan of $1,000.

When General Grant died, July 23, 1885, and the funeral procession marched down the streets of New York City, with slow tread and arms reversed, General Buckner, the Confederate general, was seen as one of the pallbearers. There went out to him such tributes of respect and friendship as perhaps were extended to no man in that sad cortege. Even death could not break a friendship that was begun when both were young men and had run through the years.
